FOREWORD

HIS EXCELLENCY
THE GOVERNOR-GENERAL OF CANADA

I AM greatly interested in the scheme, which the Carnegie Corporation has made possible, to arrange for an Exhibition of Canadian painting in the different Dominions, for I am a strong believer in the value of such exchanges on the cultural development of the Empire. I have long followed with interest the movement among Canadian artists to provide a fresh and idiomatic interpretation of Canada's wonderful and most varied landscape. They have been pioneers in as real a sense as those who first tamed the wilds for human purposes. We have in Canada much good work done in the traditional manner, and we are not forgetful of the inspiration of the classical British and French schools. But our younger artists have, most rightly, insisted on looking at landscape with their own eyes, and in devising a technique suitable to new conditions. Artists in the other British Dominions have to face the same problem, and I cannot but feel that this proof of what Canada is doing, will stimulate those who are seeking to interpret in painting the very different landscapes of South Africa, Australia and New Zealand. It is a contribution to that common stock of intellectual and artistic ideals, which is vital to the spiritual unity of the Empire.

INTRODUCTION

OF all the arts in Canada, painting must be said to have developed the greatest, if not the only measure of individuality, and to have made the most progress. The historical period covered by indigenous painting of any significance is slightly less than a hundred years and the period of any art movement definitely Canadian or nationalistic in outlook, is not more than twenty-five.

The period between these two dates was covered by the slow growth of an academic school of painting deeply and quite naturally rooted in the art schools and traditions of Great Britain and the Continent, and typified by the formation of such institutions as the Royal Canadian Academy, the Ontario Society of Artists and other bodies. This traditional manner still continues and contributes heavily to the sum total of the portrait painting but progressively less to the landscape and free figure painting throughout the country.

During the past twenty-five years a very distinct Canadianism has made its appearance in painting and to a smaller degree in sculpture and the reproductive arts. A group of young painters, mostly connected for purposes of income with commercial design, came together, drawn by similarity of artistic ideals and a healthy determination to break loose from the domination of European art schools. It was not long before they were penetrating such regions as the wilds of northern Ontario, the western prairies, the Rocky Mountains and the Pacific Coast which had never before been artistically explored and all of which yielded fresh and characteristically Canadian material for their canvasses.

Another group less united in aim developed in Montreal about the same time and perpetuated somewhat loosely and individually the ideals of the Canadian born painter James Wilson Morrice, who was then achieving distinction in Paris, having founded a characteristic style on a variety of influences among which were his first master, Henri Harpignes, and the 1870 impressionists.

The Ontario group made the greater progress and fought the harder battle for recognition. The strength and originality of the painting of Tom Thomson, J. E. H. MacDonald and others brought it such prominence that it could not be ignored however much it might be misunderstood. In 1919, for greater strength and unity, the Group of Seven was formed and continued to hold vigorous and controversial exhibitions for the next thirteen years. In 1932, when the battle for the new idea seemed to be won the Group of Seven was finally disbanded, or more correctly perhaps merged into the larger and more recently formed Canadian Group of Painters.

It was at the British Empire Exhibitions of 1924 and 1925, that Great Britain first had an opportunity of seeing this new Canadianism in art side by side with the work of her sister Dominions. A study of the critical comment of the time shows the very generous admiration and considerable surprise with which it was received. Since that time similar exhibitions have been held in Europe and in the United States, where they have been received with much the same interest and appreciated for a quality which, if not entirely worthy perhaps of the title national, in view of the immensity of the country, the smallness of the output and the immaturity of art organizations for its advancement, is nevertheless a tribute to a quality which is definitely Canadian and neither British, Continental nor American in its content.

This first exhibition to be sent to the sister dominions may be said to constitute as fair a cross-section of the work that Canadian artists are producing as could be selected at the present time. It is hoped it will prove to be the forerunner of a regular exchange of such exhibitions among the nations of the British Commonwealth and the United States of America.

The fine arts are unique in being one of the major forces for stability in a troubled world. They have no ulterior motives and in proportion as they are nationally free, have no other ends to serve than to broaden the individual horizon and to unite peoples and countries in a common understanding and appreciation of the wonders of creation and the marvellous possibilities of colour, form and design to interpret them.

Such a heritage today is particularly worth while expressing and advancing in every possible way and the Carnegie Corporation of New York, which is sponsoring this exhibition as part of its programme of assistance to the arts and sciences of the British Empire, cannot be felicitated too highly on its foresight and generosity.
